ALBA

by Itamar Harari

Alba, a name that dances on the tongue like the first light of day—"sunrise" in Italian, and a town where hills cradle vineyards, and time is measured in the slow ripening of grapes. This faucet carries that essence, not as a mere object, but as a bridge to that Northern Italian soul.

It hums with the quiet rhythm of Alba's mornings: the way sunlight seeps over valley edges, gilding rows of vines, or how mist clings to olive groves before burning off into clarity. The water that flows here feels intentional, like the same spring that nourishes the soil where Barolo grapes thrive—pure, steady, alive with the story of the land.

There's a warmth in its touch, a softness that echoes the aged oak of wine cellars, where barrels breathe and transform juice into legacy. It doesn't demand attention; instead, it weaves itself into moments: the pause before pouring a morning drink, the hush of washing hands after tending a garden, the quiet ritual of preparing a meal.
